Q: Can I clone a var with few information and with method Call by reference? I have two var: a = function(){ var l = 2; } b = a(); b.l = 4; console.log(a.l); If I call the method of a with b it works, but if I change the value of a, a is changed too. I can change the b copy to a copy and it works, but then, if I have several var, I have to create new copy of var, and it's very slow Is it possible to do the same with one var copy? A: No, you can't, because the value of a is never stored, only a reference is stored, which allows to refer to the object, which is immutable. You would have to manually make an external copy of the object before returning the function and alter it. let test = function() { let a = { foo: 1, bar: 2 }; let b = a; let l = 2; b.foo = 4; return l; } let result = test(); console.log(result); // 4 result.foo

= 5; console.log(a.foo); // 5 Nucleobase-modifying enzymes and interplay between transcription and translation in the regulation of gene expression. Regulation of gene expression at the post-transcriptional level by non-coding RNAs is a new emerging field of research. Certain classes of RNAs, such as tRNAs and rRNAs, can modify the bases of nucleobases of mRNAs (e.g., all nucleobases of adenosine to inosine). In this review we summarize how such base modification is recognized by certain proteins, namely RNA-editing factors. The impact of such RNA modifications on the translation process, and its physiological relevance are discussed. We further highlight that in certain viruses, like retroviruses, RNA-modified nucleobases are present and play an important role in a step of reverse transcription. Monica Ginn, a librarian at the California Center for Rural Policy and Development, says planning for the future will involve increasing rural connectivity, but also promoting economic diversification. “We need to create industries that are rural-centric,” says Ginn, “and we also need to help people that live in rural areas transition to become more self-sustaining.” California currently has fewer than two dozen community colleges that have rural-specific programming, says Ginn. “Some of the schools are more focused on training for self-sufficiency,” she adds, “but we need to create a wider variety of these opportunities for people to transition from one type of job to another.” Like a new career?
